The Final Report of the National Commission on Terrorist Attacks Upon the United States, also known as the 9/11 Commission Report, was a comprehensive examination of the events leading up to the September 11, 2001 terrorist attacks on the United States. The report was the result of a two-year investigation by the National Commission on Terrorist Attacks Upon the United States, a bipartisan panel appointed by President George W. Bush in the aftermath of the attacks.

The report found that the attacks were the result of a failure of imagination by the US government. The government had failed to take the threat of terrorism seriously, and it had failed to put in place the necessary safeguards to prevent an attack. The report also found that the intelligence community had failed to share information about the threat of terrorism with the rest of the government.

The report made a number of recommendations to improve the government's response to terrorism. These recommendations included increasing funding for intelligence, improving information sharing, and creating a new department of homeland security.
