He was the first African American to earn a medical degree from an American university, the first to open a medical practice in New York City, and the first to serve as a professor of anatomy at a major medical school. Smith's groundbreaking research on cholera and yellow fever helped save countless lives.

Morgan's gas mask, which he developed after witnessing a tragic industrial accident, became an essential tool for firefighters and soldiers during World War I. His three-position traffic light, which he patented in 1923, has become the standard traffic control device around the world.
